1 Introduction

The articles and monographs read in preparation for this thesis consistently lead to the conclusion that a law by Behagel dating back to 1909 is still relevant today. According to his Gesetz der wachsenden Glieder, meaning ‘law of the growing elements,’ the larger constituent follows the smaller one. In what follows, a more recent reflection is offered on the case that is made by Behagel (1909); nonetheless, it is noted here as well that his Gesetz der wachsenden Glieder is still one of the core issues in processing efficiency theory.

One pioneering work that is being cited extensively, as well, mainly by researchers in the field of Second Language Acquisition (SLA), especially with regard to the notion of interlaguage, is Selinker’s dissertation A psycholinguistic study of language transfer, which was accepted in 1966 by Georgetown University. An extract of the introduction can be found below:

The problem of ‘transfer’ of the rigid patterns of one’s native language to a foreign language is well-known to linguists as a general phenomenon. However, the extent of our information about this phenomenon and, hence, our understanding of it is quite limited and uneven. (Selinker 1966:1)

A more recent work on the same subject matter reveals that the understanding of the field of SLA underwent a radical change over the years. Ringbom (2007: 5) states that “[t]he search for similarities is an essential process in learning. The natural procedure in learning something new is to establish a relation between a new proposition or task and what already exists in the mind.” The time difference of 40 years that lies between the publications of the two cited works distinctly manifests itself in the way the two linguists describe the phenomenon of transfer. In Selinker’s times, it was regarded as problematic that learners show traces of their L1 in their L2 performances, whereas Ringbom draws the nowadays inevitable conclusion that the transfer of features from the L1 to the L2 is natural and even essential in order to progress in the learning of a foreign language.

It was Ringbom (1987: 1f.), too, who noticed that “[t]he question now has for a long time been not whether transfer exists, but in what circumstances L2 learners transfer what; how much is transferred, and why” [Emphasis in original, LS]. Given that this insight dates only 30 years back, it is not surprising that these questions cannot be answered exhaustively and further research is needed in order to fully understand the processes that take place when an individual tries to learn a foreign language. This assumption is confirmed by Myles (2015: 311), who states that [...] the conscious declarative knowledge of grammar rules does not necessarily translate into a productive rule generated by the mental grammar of the learner; these two types of knowledge are separate, and although they might interact and feed into one another in some way, this process is poorly understood to date and its existence remains controversial, with some SLA theorists arguing that they do interact and others that they do not [...].

Another aspect that lies within the scope of this small-scale study is addressed in the quotation above and it regards the role that a learner's conscious knowledge of the language's rules plays. In the case of the present study, this knowledge is of a different nature than the type of unconscious knowledge the same learner might arrive at after being exposed to the statistical make-up of the target language, or as it is phrased in Ellis (2012: 203): "Language, a moving target then, can neither be described nor experienced comprehensively, and so, in essence, language learning is estimation from sample" [Emphasis in original, LS].

This leads us further into the realm of corpus linguistics, which is characterized by Myles (2015: 313) in a way that is applicable to the purpose of this study. Although Myles (ibid.) prefers oral corpora to investigate the productive system of a learner, she admits that written corpora mirror a learner's memory of a language's rules, which means that the latter type of corpus is more suitable for the description of a learner's implicit knowledge. In order to set a framework for the data analysis, four areas of interest were defined, which were formulated not too strictly in order to retain the descriptive angle of this study.

1. What is the predominating order of Prepositional Phrases (PPs) in the learners' English?

Since "Manner before Place before Time" is the order that is usually taught at schools, it should be reasonably expected, that the majority of PP sequences will be ordered compliant with this rule.

2. Do the learners respond to the statistical make-up of the English language?

Apart from formal instruction at school or in online courses as is the case with the learners on whose data this study is based, L2 learners are encouraged to cultivate their language competence by consuming authentic English language material, for example by reading books or watching movies in English. This means that learners are exposed to the tendencies of shorter PPs preceding longer ones, which were described in Hawkins (2000), and the question is to what extent this is visible in their ordering tendencies in the present corpus analysis.

3. Does language proficiency figure into the learners' performance?

It may be presumed that the further the learners progress in their acquisition of English, the more time they have spent consuming English language material as was mentioned above, which means that they have been exposed to the violation of M-P-T for a longer period of time than the learners at beginner's level. Does this result in the significantly stronger disregard of the rule in more advanced learners than it is the case in the beginners' groups and are more advanced learners influenced by weight effects in the way that was observed by Hawkins?

4. How is the learners' first language reflected by their performances?

The three different nationalities German, French and Russian were chosen for this study in order to compare the languages' various grammatical make-ups and to determine in how far the transfer of features from their L1 to the L2 is noticeable.

The order of presentation is as follows: In section 2 the notion of processing efficiency will be explained on the basis of Hawkins' (2000) article that gave the impulse for this study. Section 3 is dedicated to the learners of English as their second language and it deals in greater detail with transfer in 3.1 and the field of learner corpus research in 3.2. In section 3.3 the learners' first languages – German, French and Russian – are introduced and their syntactic characteristics, which are relevant to the purpose of this study, are specified. In the methodology section 4, the corpus, which was used to conduct this study, is introduced, followed by a detailed description of the methods that were applied to analyze the retrieved data sets. Sections 5.1 – 5.3 hold the results of the analysis of all three learner data sets, which are discussed in section 5.4 and furthermore compared to the native speaker data that was presented in Hawkins (2000). In the conclusion in section 6 the findings of this study are summarized and the questions that were posed here are addressed again.

2 A theory of processing efficiency: Going beyond Manner-Place-Time

The main ideas presented in Hawkins' (2000) article with the same heading gave rise to the development of this study. Before the article is further introduced, it shall be defined, what the term processing entails and how it will be used in the following.

Processing refers to making a connection between form and meaning/function. What this definition underscores is that in the present model of input processing, processing is not equivalent to perception, noticing and other terms that are often used in the SLA literature [...]. As I understand these other terms, they do not require that learners connect form to meaning or function. Thus, a learner may notice a third-person -s on the end of a verb, but not connect it to any function or meaning. (VanPatten 2012: 269f.)

In other words, processing describes the learner's endeavor to understand the target language (TL) as opposed to simply being aware of certain features. Furthermore parsing, a term that is used in this context as well, more specifically refers to the computation of a given syntactic structure, in order to assign thematic roles (cf. Harley 2008: 287). Keeping these concepts in mind, the discussion of Hawkins' (2000) claims may commence in the following.

In his article, Hawkins (2000) challenges the generally accepted ordering of prepositional phrases (PPs) in postverbal position according to the semantic rule 'Manner before Place before Time' (M-P-T). As Hawkins (ibid.) points out, this rule can be found i.a. in the standard work A comprehensive grammar of the English language by Quirk, Greenbaum, Leech and Svartvik (1985) and in Boisson (1981), according to whom this rule has the status of a typological parameter, which is usually reversed to "Time before Place before Manner" (T-P-M) in verb-final languages. Hawkins (2000: 232) acknowledges that Quirk et al. (1985) as well as Boisson (1981) identify the preference for short-long-sequences. Instead it is argued in these sources that M-P-T holds true, because in this order the respective phrases are placed according to their centrality to the verb. Hawkins (ibid.) however declares this to be a "crude aggregation" and argues that this rule cannot be generalized to describe all types of dependencies between verbs and PPs. Hawkins (2000) also considers ambiguity avoidance and pragmatic information status as factors influencing the ordering of PPs, but since his findings indicate that these two factors barely have an impact, they will not be considered in this study.

sentences, which were analyzed in Hawkins (2000), 41 (71%) instances of the 58 exceptions to EIC can be ascribed to lexical dependency, lexical matching or range reduction (Hawkins 2000: 257). Lexical adjacency, lexical dependency, lexical matching and range reduction, however, do not lie within the scope of this study and are therefore not further discussed.

A different perspective on the subject matter of processing efficiency is held by Wasow (1997), who criticizes Hawkins (1994) and others for their claim that the tendency to put long and complex constituents at the ends of sentences exist because they facilitate parsing for the listener (see for example Biber et al. 1999: 898). Wasow (1997: 349f.) challenges in particular the assumption that “speakers are extremely considerate and extremely good at planning,” and instead suggests that “weight effects exist primarily to facilitate utterance planning and production.” It is further argued that the producer of language material is the one determining the order of constituents (cf. Wasow 1997: 530). This perspective seems to be more central to the present context, since the objects of this study are adult L2 learners of English and it is questionable to what extent a foreign language learner is able to facilitate parsing for the listener or reader.

3 The object of this study: The L2 learner of English

In this section, the object of the analysis, i.e. the L2 learner of English, is of interest. However, an exhaustive account of the research area of Second Language Acquisition (SLA) will not be presented here, since this field and its various approaches exceed the scope of this small-scale study. The remarks in the following will therefore be confined to the notion of transfer and learner corpus research.

One of the issues, which were raised in the introductory section considering the purpose of this study, was the question of the extent to which the learners abide by the M-P-T rule, since this ordering is predominantly taught at schools. One widely cited approach to the distinction of acquisition and learning stems from Krashen (1982: 10):

[...] adults have two distinct and independent ways of developing competence in a second language. The first way is language acquisition, a process similar, if not identical to the way children develop ability in their first language. Language acquisition is a subconscious process; language acquirers are not usually aware of the fact that they are acquiring language, but are only aware of the fact that they are using the language for communication. The result of language acquisition, acquired competence, is also subconscious. We are generally not consciously aware of the rules of the languages we have acquired. Instead, we have a “feel” for correctness. Grammatical sentences “sound” right, or “feel” right, and errors feel wrong, even if we do not consciously know what rule was violated [...] The second way to develop competence in a second language is by language learning. We will use the term “learning” henceforth to refer to conscious knowledge of second language, knowing the rules, being aware of them, and being able to talk about them. In nontechnical terms, learning is “knowing about” a language, known to most people as “grammar”, or “rules”. Some synonyms include formal knowledge of a language or explicit learning. [Emphasis in original, LS]

Even though Krashen defines acquisition and learning above as two distinct processes in language learning, it seems as if they complement each other, because without learning rules, the language learner would not have internalized measures that help him or her to determine whether or not a rule was violated or if a sentence “sounds” right. However, in the present study it is dealt with rather opposing tendencies, that is the conscious learning of M-P-T at school on the one hand and the statistically significant deviation from this rule in native speaker English (cf. Hawkins 2000) that might be perceived subconsciously on the other hand.

3.1 The study of transfer

The role that the learners' first languages, in this case German, French and Russian, play is of interest in this study as well. Therefore, it shall be explained in this section what transfer is and what is known about it so far. In his monograph Cross-linguistic similarities in foreign language learning, Ringbom (2007:1) incipiently remarks:

Learning, including language learning, is based on prior knowledge. When you learn something new, such as a foreign language, you try to connect the new elements to whatever linguistic and other knowledge you may have. Both intralinguistic and cross-linguistic knowledge are relevant to the learner of another language.

If this statement is taken for granted, the consideration of transfer in any endeavor that evolves around second language learners seems to be inevitable, seeing that language learning is “based” on prior knowledge. And indeed, the fact that a myriad of approaches to this topic exists proves that the questions of what a learner transfers from his L1 to the target language (TL) is by no means sufficiently answered.

As was mentioned above, numerous publications attended to this field of research and it is therefore advisable to define its scope. Sharwood Smith and Kellerman (1986:1) use the term cross-linguistic influence (or crosslinguistic influence) (CLI) as an umbrella term for “such phenomena as ‘transfer’, ‘interference’, ‘avoidance’, ‘borrowing’ and ‘L2-related aspects of language loss’”. While one of the advantages of the term crosslinguistic influence is that it does not entail a negative connotation, as might be perceived with interference (see for example Presas 2000: 25), it is, however too broad for the scope of this study, since “L2-related aspects of language loss” (ibid.) for example, are not of interest in this study. Furthermore, in a discussion on the term itself, Ringbom (2007: 30) concludes that transfer seems to no longer carry associations that stem from its origin in behaviourist psychology. He therefore continues to use the term, which will be adopted here as well due to its ubiquity in SLA research and despite the criticism of the term by Kellerman and Sharwood Smith (1986) to use the term cross-linguistic influence instead.

Gass (1979: 328) defines transfer as “the imposition of previously learned patterns onto a new learning situation” and she furthermore states that “patterns of the NL [=Native Language] (of all levels of linguistic structure), including both forms and functions of elements are superimposed on the patterns learned in a second language” (ibid.). Again, it is determined, that transfer is an inevitable process of language learning, which means that it should be noticeable in this study as well; it only remains to be seen to what extent transfer manifests itself in the learner data. Osborne (2015: 335) observes that “[t]raditionally, this influence is seen as potentially having positive effects which can facilitate learning (‘positive transfer’ or ‘facilitation’) or negative effects that can inhibit learning (‘negative transfer’ or ‘interference’): However, as was stated above, this is a distinction that will not be made here, since the article by Hawkins (2000: 231) renders the status of M-P-T as an untenable typological parameter questionable, so that the distinction between “positive” and “negative” or “right” and “wrong” in general is not relevant. What shall be done here is a descriptive survey of the learners’ ordering preferences for PPs, since “transfer is a more complex phenomenon than a simple positive-negative opposition might suggest” (Osborne 2015: 335).

When it comes to research in the field of cross-linguistic influence in general, Jarvis and Pavlenko (2008: 96) observe a certain neglect of morphology and syntax on the part of CLI studies, since these two domains were apparently deemed “immune to CLI effects,” even though several studies report syntactic transfer in word order as well as well-formedness constraints in reception and production. In his dissertation, Selinker (1966) tested the performance of Hebrew school children speaking English and complemented his findings with those of a control group of American school children. Among other syntactic occurrences, the relative ordering of Time and Place constituents was tested, which led to interesting results. Selinker (1966: 73) notes that in those instances in which a Place string co-occurs with a Time string in postverbal position their frequencies do not show a significant trend, meaning that in the Hebrew learner group, 34 instances of Place before Time were noted, as opposed to 44 instances of Time before Place, which leads Selinker (1966: 85f.) to conclude that in Hebrew either order is the norm.

When asked to speak English, 24 instances of Place before Time and 46 instances of alternative ordering were found. Since the order of Time and Place constituents seems to be interchangeable in Hebrew, but when asked to produce English sentences the learners strongly preferred Time–Place ordering, Selinker (1966: 104) does not ascribe the ordering of Time and Place constituents in Hebrew learners of English to transfer. Instead, he suggests “‘incorrect’ judgement on the part of the analyst as to what the speaker identified as ‘same’, inadequate definition of linguistic entities or of their boundaries, experimental procedure giving clues as to the responses desired, etc”.

In the group of English native speakers, Selinker (1966: 93) found 33 instances of Place before Time and 4 instances that were the other way around, which is surprising to him, as he acknowledges the ordering Place-Time to be “accepted as the English norm for this particular combination.”; examples from Selinker’s (ibid.) data are shown in example (2) below.

- (2)     a. the books are now on the table
          b. I live now in Silver Spring Maryland.

It is suggested here that the subjects might have produced these 4 outliers, because they acted on the weight differences of the constituents. However, Selinker (ibid.) claims that those 4 occurrences of Time-Place do not show a pattern and further explains these outliers as “chance occurrences.” Admittedly, the number of four occurrences does not constitute a sufficient data set to draw a conclusion

In some cases, similarities between the first language and the target language are not routed in formal features that the two languages share, but they are said to be perceived (cf. Kellermann 1977), which suggests that the similarities merely rely on the learner’s language intuition rather than common features. Ringbom (2007: 7f.) acknowledges that perceived similarity is a ‘fuzzy concept’ and instead it should be focused on objective similarities that can be measured. In their study Hall and Ecke (2005) asked multilingual learners, who spoke English and Spanish about their attitudes towards German and French and they found that 80% perceived English to be easier for a speaker of Spanish, while 90% felt that for an English speaker, it was easier to learn German than Spanish. Ringbom (ibid.) concludes that perceived similarities strongly correlate with genetic similarities, meaning that languages that are closely related will be judged easier to learn. “Basically, learners assume that the items (words) will be different, but that the system of the TL [=Target Language] will work more or less in the same way as their L1 or some other language known to them” (Ringbom 2007: 10).

3.2 The field of learner corpus research

For a deeper understanding of the area of investigation, this section is concerned with a characterization of Learner Corpus Research (LCR). According to Granger et al. (2015:1) learner corpora can be defined as “electronic collections of natural or near-natural data produced by foreign or second language (L2) learners and assembled according to explicit design criteria.” Gilquin and Granger (2015: 418) observe that it was not until the late 1980s that interest in learner language on the part of corpus linguistics increased and LCR emerged from a field that was the domain of Second Language Acquisition (SLA). Researchers of both fields take interest in learner language, however, their objectives and methods of analysis vary significantly, since studies in SLA focus on competence, while LCR studies focus on performance (ibid.). The field of English as a Lingua Franca (ELF) may be disregarded as well, since it revolves around the use of an L2 for communication purposes (ibid.).

One of the main advantages of LCR resides in the type of data that is examined, because, as Gilquin and Granger (2015: 419) formulate, “the focus on learner corpus data is on message conveyance and the possibility for learners to use their own wording”, which allows the researcher to obtain authentic language learner data. Citing Bündgens-Kosten (2013: 272), Meunier and Reppen (2015: 500) define authenticity as “the result of a social negotiation process rather than an innate feature of a text, object, person, or activity.”

Furthermore, studies in LCR focus on lexis, lexico-grammar and discourse phenomena, while grammatical features have been underresearched, according to Gilquin and Granger (2015: 420). Considering general research orientations, Gilquin and Granger (2015: 420f.) add that LCR studies tend to be exploratory and descriptive, since learner corpora are usually designed to answer an array of research questions. Further important aspects of LCR are the implications that it has for language teaching and the development of pedagogical tools, which, however will not be further addressed.

With regard to the progress of frequency-based accounts in linguistic research, (Ellis 2008: 373) remarks:

The past 50 years of research in psycholinguistics demonstrates that language processing is rational in that it is exquisitely sensitive to prior usage. Fluent language processing reflects frequency of usage at all sizes of grain: phonology and phonotactics, reading, spelling, lexis, morpho-syntax, formulaic language, language comprehension, grammaticality, sentence production, and syntax.”

Apparently, the learner of a language perceives the frequency of items and structures in various linguistic entities, which leads Ellis (2002: 166) to conclude that “the knowledge underlying fluent use of language is not grammar in the sense of abstract rules or structure but a huge collection of memories of previously experienced utterances.” Ellis (2012: 196) explains this circumstance with the fact that statistical knowledge of a language helps learners to process linguistic occurrences more fluently. He further establishes that “[f]requency is a key determinant of acquisition because ‘rules’ of language [...] are structural regularities which emerge from learners’ lifetime analysis of the distributional characteristics of the language input.”

Finally, in order to return to the starting point of this section, which was the L2 learner of English, Ellis’ (2002: 175) conclusion is considered one last time, which states that “[...] focused L2 instruction results in large target oriented gains, that explicit types of instruction are more effective than implicit types, and that the effectiveness of L2 instruction is durable” (see also Norris and Ortega 2000). Considering these findings one should expect the learners of this study to adhere closely to the M-P-T rule and allow few exceptions to it. The mere fact that a sizable number of sentences which deviate from the rule exist in all three learner groups shows that L2 learners – deliberately or subconsciously – exploit other principles of ordering PPs.

3.3 The learners' linguistic backgrounds

In this section, the characteristics of the learners' first languages, which are relevant to the purpose of this study, are introduced and illustrated. The main focus is on word order in general and on the influence that syntactic weight has on the ordering of the constituents in a sentence. Each subsection begins with an introductory part about the language in question, which is ensued by the explanation of the above mentioned issues. First, in section 3.3.1 German is introduced, followed by French in 3.3.2 and lastly Russian in 3.3.3.

3.3.1 German

According to the Metzler Lexikon Sprache, German is a collective term for various West Germanic languages that can be divided into High German dialects of the south and Low German vernaculars of the north. In the narrower sense, German is a supraregionally spoken and written language that is used by approximately 90 million people as a first language and by 5 million people as a second language (ibid.). German has official status in Germany, Austria, Liechtenstein, Luxembourg (among Luxembourgish and French) and Switzerland (among French, Italian and Rhaetian) and is a minority language in South Tyrol, the east of Belgium, southern Jutland, Alsace and Lorraine and in regions of the former USSR (ibid.).

Schweikert (2005: 47) describes the classification of German word order as “challenging,” since generative grammarians cannot define German word order exclusively as either SVO or SOV, due to the fact that the finite verb appears in second position in main clauses and in final position in dependent clauses. Furthermore, arguments can move within the sentence with a certain degree of freedom and thus express the speaker's or writer's choice of topic in a given sentence, as can be seen in example 3 by Schweikert (ibid.) below.

- (3) 'Hans gave a bunch of flowers to his girlfriend.'
Hans gab seiner Freundin einen Blumenstrauß.
Seiner Freundin gab Hans einen Blumenstrauß.
Einen Blumenstrauß gab Hans seiner Freundin.
Hans gab einen Blumenstrauß seiner Freundin.

All four German sentences in italics may be used to translate the English one, since those four sentences are all grammatically correct and only vary in the ‘topic-focus’ as is pointed out by Schweikert (ibid.). However, as was stated above, the arguments may not move around the sentence without any restrictions, as can be seen in example 4 by Schweikert (ibid.) below.

- (4)    **Seiner Freundin gab einen Blumenstrauß Hans.*
       **Einen Blumenstrauß gab seiner Freundin Hans.*

These sentences are ungrammatical or highly marked at least, because the subject appears neither in first position, nor directly after the verb, which is why these two sentences would not be used to translate ‘Hans gave a bunch of flowers to his girlfriend’ (cf. Schweikert 2005: 48).

Regarding the order of PPs in postverbal position, Schweikert (2005: 49) establishes that native speakers usually follow the rule “Temporal> Locative> Instrumental,” however, he also observes that the order among different types of PPs is liberal, as is shown in (5) (Schweikert 2005: 48f.).

- (5)    a. Hans hat in München am Sonntag geschlafen.
       ‘Hans slept in Munich on Sunday.’
       Hans hat am Sonntag in München geschlafen.
       ‘Hans slept on Sunday in Munich.’
       b. Hans hat das Radio mit dem Schraubenzieher am Freitag repariert.
       ‘Hans repaired the radio with the screwdriver on Friday.’
       Hans hat das Radio mit dem Schraubenzieher am Freitag repariert
       ‘Hans repaired the radio on Friday with the screwdriver.’

The order of PPs in all four German sentences in italics is considered grammatical, though the first sentences in a and b respectively appear to be less marked, which, according to Schweikert (ibid.) is rather weak as an indicator for a coherent order.

Lastly, with regard to syntactic weight, Schweikert (ibid.) notes that “the order between PP types seems to be even more liberal.” This is illustrated in 6 below by an example by Schweikert (ibid.).

- (6) a. Ich habe [für Herrn Mayer] [im Garten] gearbeitet.
‘I worked in the garden for Mr. Mayer’
b. Ich habe [im Garten] [für Herrn Mayer] gearbeitet.
‘I worked for Mr. Mayer in the garden’

Schweikert (ibid.) claims that neither of the two sentences would be preferred over the other by German speakers, which is interesting in this context, because the PP für Herrn Mayer is longer than the PP im Garten. However, Schweikert (ibid.) further argues that “it would be precipitous to deduce that they have identical information structure. If we change the question and ask for the other PP constituent ‘Where did you work for Mr. Mayer?’ the second sentence [...] becomes slightly degraded as an answer to it.”

3.3.2 French

The Metzler Lexikon Sprache classifies French as a Gallo-Romance language, which is spoken by approximately 80 million people in France, Canada, Switzerland, Belgium and Luxemburg and is furthermore used as a Lingua Franca around the world. For centuries, French was spoken at court and as a colonial language, which resulted in several French-based pidgins and creoles that were formed in the Caribbean and islands in the western Indian Ocean and that are spoken by roughly 9 million people. Today, it is one of the most important cultural languages and countless words have been borrowed by speakers of other languages. French has an official status in African countries, most notably the Maghreb and Equatorial Africa, and is spoken in some regions as a second language.

According to the International Encyclopedia of Linguistics, French is characterized as an SVO language, which is illustrated by the examples below, taken from Harris (1992: 29).

- (7) a. Jean aime Marie
‘John loves Mary.’
b. Nous allons à Paris
‘We are going to Paris.’

However, as is pointed out by Harris (ibid.), in spoken French SVO might give way to cleft structures. Example (8) below shows an instance of such a structure.

- (8) C'est Marie que Jean aime
'It's Mary that John loves'

Dethloff and Wagner (2007: 654), too, state that in a declarative sentence, the order of constituents is SVO, unless a certain constituent is stressed. Furthermore, the direct object precedes the indirect object, unless the direct object is rather long or central to the utterance. The pair of sentences in (9) below was taken from Dethloff and Wagner (ibid.); emphases in original.

- (9) a. Nous avons raconté cette histoire à nos parents.
'We have told this story to our parents.'
b. Nous avons demandé à Jérôme un service particulièrement important.
'We have asked Jérôme a particularly important favor'

In a, the order of direct object and indirect object is shown as it usually occurs, meaning that the direct object cette histoire precedes the indirect object à nos parents. It may be argued that cette histoire holds its position in the sentence, because it is central to the utterance, however, the example above is meant to illustrate that even though there is an order in which direct and indirect object occur within a sentence, it may be altered due to centrality to the speaker or length considerations. In sentence b, the direct object in bold is much longer than the indirect object à Jérôme and therefore placed sentence-finally. Interestingly in sentence b. the order of the phrase demande un service à quelqu'un, which means 'to ask somebody a favour' is changed due to the syntactic weight of the direct object.

Abeillé and Godard (2000: 326f.) however, observe that, apart from discursive factors, complements in French are usually not ordered with respect to one another, which they illustrate with the following examples.

- (10) a. Paul donne un livre à son fils.
'Paul gives a book to his son.'

Paul donne à son fils un livre.

‘Paul gives to his son a book.’

b. Cette musique rend mon fils fou de joie.

‘This music makes my son really happy.’

Cette musique rend fou de joie mon fils.

‘*This music makes really happy my son.’

In a, the order of the direct and the indirect object is arbitrary, as is the ordering of the predicative object and the direct object in b. Nonetheless, Abeillé and Godard (ibid.) are consistent with Dethloff and Wagner’s (ibid.) claim that the ordering of certain constituents may be motivated by their syntactic weight, which they illustrate with the example that is provided in (11) below by Abeillé and Godard (ibid.).

(11) ‘The destruction of Rome by the Barbarians.’

La destruction par les Barbares de Rome.

In this example, the complements of the noun destruction may be ordered either way, but the first ordering would be preferred due to the syntactic weight of par les Barbares.

3.3.3 Russian

The Metzler Lexikon Sprache classifies Russian as an East Slavic language that is spoken in the Russian Federation by roughly 127 million people as a first language and by 16 million people as a second language. Though it was never formally declared as such, Russian served as a “language of international rapprochement” and as an official language in the USSR in order to unify its civilization. It is still spoken today in those states that were newly formed after the liquidation of the USSR, with the exception of the Baltic States. According to Timberlake (2008: 827), who refers to the 1979 census, Russian was and is the native language of all 137 million ethnic Russians of the former Soviet Union; additionally, 16 million people of other ethnic groups claimed Russian as their first language. Moreover, the language is spoken by approximately 88 million people, due to the language having an official status in countries such as Kazakhstan, Belarus, Turkmenistan and the Crimean Peninsula (cf. Glück 2010). Since Russian is spoken by such a vast number of people, it is used as a lingua franca, especially in Eastern Europe, which includes 61 million more people, who claim to be functional in Russian (ibid.).

According to Kirschbaum (2004: 358f.), the order of constituents and phrases in a Russian sentence is flexible and mainly determined by the intention of the speaker, the context and register. These factors shape the functional sentence perspective (актуальное членение) of the sentence that suits the content of the respective utterance (ibid.). Gabka (1976: 69) furthermore points out that the ordering of constituents in a sentence according to the functional sentence perspective is typical for neutral, non-empathetic and objective language and is therefore domineering in academic and official texts. The information value of a sentence will act on the order of its constituents and prompts the speaker or writer to place the piece of information that is known to the listener or reader before the new piece of information which is placed sentence finally (ibid.). Thus, a sentence is split according to the speaker's objective into the theme, which denotes the topic of the utterance, and the rheme, which always follows the theme and provides further information on the topic. The exemplary sentence in (12) below was taken from Krylova and Khavronina (1977: 13), emphasis in original.

(12) Виктор был у меня в гостях.

‘Victor payed me a visit.’

The theme of the sentence above is Victor, as he is central to what the speaker intends to say, while the rest of the sentence, which is highlighted in bold, is the rheme, because it is revealed here more specifically what Victor did.

Comrie (2011 :268f.) refers to Russian as a free word order language, which means that “in general, any permutation of the major constituents of the clause produces a grammatical sentence with essentially the same meaning as the original order (in particular, with the same truth conditions).” Below, in the example taken from Comrie (bid.) this principle is illustrated by the six Russian sentences in italics that are possible translations of ‘Viktor meets Lena’.

- (13) ‘Viktor meets Lena’
Viktor vstrečáet Lénu
Viktor Lénu vstrečáet
Lénu Viktor vstrečáet
Lénu vstrečáet Viktor
vstrečáet Viktor Lénu
vstrečáet Lénu Viktor

Due to the Russian morphology, the grammatical relations of the various major constituents are unmistakable, since the nominative Viktor is the subject, while the accusative Lénu is the direct object. In order to say ‘Lena met Viktor’, the cases needed to be changed to Léna vstrečáet Viktora or any variation of these words.

Gabka (1976: 233) observes that SVO dominates the ordering of constituents in Russian sentences, because the subject usually belongs to the theme, while the object is part of the rheme. Syntactic relations are mainly expressed through flexion; there are, however, a few exceptions in which a sequence of constituents or phrases serves a grammatical function. The examples in (14) below were taken from Kirschbaum (2004: 362f.).

- (14) a. Мать любит дочь.
‘The mother loves the daughter.’
b. Мой брат – геолог<sup>1</sup>.
‘My brother is a geologist.’
c. Не́бо ясное.
‘The sky is clear.’

Sentences consisting of only two constituents are rigid in their order when the subject and the object of a sentence are expressed through substantives that have the same form in the nominative and accusative cases (a), when subject and predicative noun are expressed by a substantive in the nominative case (b) and when the subject is a substantive in the nominative case and the predicate is an adjective (c).

Finally, regarding the role that syntactic weight might have on the Russian learners in this study, Hawkins' (1998: 751f.) processing theory shall be addressed, which, according to Hawkins himself:

provides a unified theory of performance and grammar and claims that linear orderings in free word order languages and linear orderings in fixed word order languages are regulated by the same principle. [...] This view of free word order languages amounts to the claim that the selection of alternative orderings in these languages is driven by syntactic processing, and not by pragmatic information status and the 'givenness', 'newness', and 'predictability' of entities that are referred to in discourse [...].

However, due to the conclusion that may be drawn from various sources cited above, Russian word order seems to be mainly driven by the information status that the speaker or writer wishes to express or assumes his listener or reader is able to comprehend. It therefore remains to be seen, how the Russian learners in this study cope with the ordering of two PPs that are of different length.

4 Methodology

In this section, it is shown how the corpus search was carried out and how the data were analyzed. In section 4.1, the corpus that was used to conduct the search – the EF-Cambridge Open Language Database (EFCAMDAT) – as well as its contents are introduced. Secondly, in section 4.2 the methods of data elicitation and data selection are explained. This includes the setting of the criteria against which every sentence that was analyzed was measured, the handling of the learners' errors and a short explanation of chi square, a statistical test of significance, which was used to determine whether or not the data occur by chance.

4.1 The EF-Cambridge Open Language Database

The EF Cambridge Open Language Database (EFCAMDAT) was developed by the Department of Theoretical and Applied Linguistics at the University of Cambridge in cooperation with the organization Education First (EF) (cf. Geertzen et al. 2013). The texts in the corpus stem from learner essays that were collected by EF's online school Englishtown<sup>2</sup> (ibid.). It comprises 551,036 scripts containing 32,980,407 words that were written by 84,864 learners of various linguistic backgrounds (ibid.). Furthermore, the learners' progress over time can be followed, which enables longitudinal studies of second language performance (ibid.). An Englishtown course comprises of 16 proficiency levels, as is shown in table 1 below for a comparison with the levels of Cambridge English for Speakers of Other Languages (ESOL), with the International English Language Testing System (IELTS), with the Test of English as a Foreign Language (TOEFL), with the Test of English for International Communication (TOEIC) and with the Common European Framework of Reference for languages (CEFR).

<sup>2</sup> Meanwhile, Englishtown has been renamed English Live; further information may be gathered from their website <https://englishlive.ef.com/en-gb/>

Table 1. Englishtown proficiency levels in comparison to ESOL, IELTS, TOEFL, and CEFR (Geertzen et al. 2013)

Englishtown	1-3	4-6	7-9	10-12	13-15	16
Cambridge ESOL	-	KET	PET	FCE	CAE	-
IELTS	-	<3	4-5	5-6	6-7	>7
TOEFL iBT	-	-	57-86	87-109	110-120	-
TOEIC Listening & Reading	120-220	225-545	550-780	785-940	945	-
TOEIC Speaking & Writing	40-70	80-110	120-140	150-190	200	-
CEFR	A1	A2	B1	B2	C1	C2

Before an Englishtown course can be commenced, a placement test has to be taken to assess the learner's competence (ibid.). Once a learner is placed at one of the proficiency levels, writing tasks and a variety of receptive and productive tasks in each of the eight lessons per proficiency level are required to be taken (ibid.). In order to complete the respective levels, students are asked to write a short essay on one of various topics; some of which are shown in table 2 below.

Table 2. A sample of essay topics at different levels (Geertzen et al. 2013).

ID	Essay topic	ID	Essay topic
1:1	Introducing yourself by email	7:1	Giving instructions to play a game
1:3	Writing an online profile	8:2	Reviewing a song for a website
2:1	Describing your favourite day [sic]	9:7	Writing an apology email
2:6	Telling someone what you're doing	11:1	Writing a movie review
2:8	Describing your family's eating habits	12:1	Turning down an invitation
3:1	Replying to a new penpal [sic]	13:4	Giving advice about budgeting
4:1	Writing about what you do	15:1	Covering a news story
6:4	Writing a resume	16:8	Researching a legendary creature

Since eight units have to be passed to successfully finish each of the 16 levels, a learner has to submit a total of short 128 essays comprising 7 sentences on average to complete the course, if the learner starts with level 1 and finishes all 16 (ibid.). The texts are proofread and graded by English teachers, who provide feedback and decide whether or not a student passes a level (ibid.).

Even though the learners' first languages are not elicited more precisely, an estimation can be made based on the learners' nationalities. Table 3 offers an overview of the countries that, taken together, yield 87.6% of all the scripts in the corpus.

Table 3. Number of scripts spread across the nationalities with most learners (Geertzen et al. 2013).

Nationality	Percentage of scripts	Number of Scripts
Brazilians	36.9%	187,286
Chinese	18.7%	96,843
Russians	8.5%	44,187
Mexicans	7.9%	41,115
Germans	5.6%	29,192
French	4.3%	22,146
Italians	4.0%	20,934
Saudi Arabians	3.3%	16,585
Taiwanese	2.6%	13,596
Japanese	2.1%	10,673

For the present study, learners from Germany, France and Russia at all of the 16 proficiency levels were considered. In the following section it will be revealed how the data were extracted from the corpus.

In order to carry out research in EFCAMDAT, at least one proficiency level and one nationality must each be selected from a drop-down menu as a filter. Since all proficiency levels are of interest in this study, all 16 were selected in one go, followed by the selection of one nationality at a time, as is shown in figure 1 below.

The screenshot shows the EF-CAMbridge open language DATabase interface. At the top, there are logos for Education First and the University of Cambridge, Department of Theoretical and Applied Linguistics. The main title is "EF-CAMbridge open language DATabase" with a user profile for Lisa Schneider and a "Log out" link.

On the left, there is a navigation menu with options: Introduction, Select scripts, Query corpus, Export data, Get access, and FAQ. The "Select scripts" option is currently selected.

The main content area is titled "Select scripts" and contains the following text: "If you are interested in querying or exporting scripts from specific levels, activities, or learner backgrounds, please specify this below. Numbers in parentheses indicate the number of scripts available." Below this, a summary box states: "The current selection contains 43049 scripts (±2936084 words) from: 7251 learners, 1 nationalities, 128 unit(s) from level(s): 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16. There is a checkbox for "scripts only from learners who have completed all the selected units".

Under the heading "Teaching levels and units", there are three dropdown menus:

- "Please select levels--" showing a list of levels from 1 to 7 with their respective script counts. Level 1 is selected.
- "Please select units--" showing a list of units under "Level 1", including "Greetings and introductions (2867)", "Colors and numbers (1719)", "Where are you from? (1466)", and "Family (1134)". "Greetings and introductions" is selected.
- "Selected units--" showing the currently selected units: "Level 1", "Greetings and introductions (2867)", "Colors and numbers (1719)", "Where are you from? (1466)", "Family (1134)", and "Jobs (988)".

Under the heading "Learner nationalities", there are three dropdown menus:

- "Please select continent--" showing a list of continents: "Africa (2569)", "Asia (154949)", "Europe (124406)", "North America (58149)", "South America (194340)", and "Oceania (527)". "Europe" is selected.
- "Please select countries--" showing a list of countries: "Russia (43049)", "Germany (28555)", "France (21600)", "Italy (20377)", and "United Kingdom (1577)". "Russia" is selected.
- "Selected countries--" showing the currently selected countries: "Europe" and "Russia (43049)".

Once the scripts that are to be searched are selected, a search string must be entered in the next step. For the purpose of this study, the search string consisted of two prepositions that were to occur in one sentence, which resulted in the command `[word="at"][] {1,3} [word="with"]`. The two prepositions, in this case at and with, can be found in the square brackets, preceded by “word=” and the gap between the two words is indicated by the empty square brackets. In order to find the respective PP combinations within sentence boundaries, at least 1, but no more than 3 words were to occur between the two prepositions, which is indicated in curly brackets. Figure 2 below offers an example of such a query.

Figure 2. Corpus search of at and with in scripts written by Russian learners of all proficiency levels.

The grey box at the top of figure 2 shows the choice that was made considering proficiency levels and nationalities and it further shows how many scripts are being examined. In the box on the bottom of figure 2 all matches of the corpus query are highlighted in yellow and bold. If the user clicks on one of the sentences, further information appears next to the box on the right.

4.2 Data analysis

Once the data from all 12 PP combinations and all three learner nationalities were extracted as is described in the previous section, the analysis could commence as follows. First of all, the amount of data, which was to be analyzed, needed to be narrowed down, which was done by excluding all sentences that were useless for the analysis. In the article that gave the impetus to this thesis, Hawkins (2000: 237) sets the following criteria for the selection of data that were to be analyzed.

Table 4. Hawkins' (2000: 237) criteria for the selection of [V PP PP].

All sequences that met the following criteria were selected from the corpus of Appendix 1:

- The two PPs were permutable with truth-conditional equivalence.
- No other categories or phrases were allowed in postverbal position within the clause, apart from finite subordinate clauses or infinitival VPs.
- V must be simple, not a phrasal verb or complex predicate (e.g. no particles).
- V must be intransitive or passivized transitive.
- V could be finite or non-finite.
- PP must dominate [P NP], possibly including an adverbial specifier before P.

Since non-native speakers of English are central to this study, a few adjustments were made in order to meet the requirements of the learner groups. Therefore, a set of new criteria was derived from those above in table 4, in order to ensure the comparability of the learner data that were elicited here and of Hawkins' (2000) native speaker data.

Table 5. Criteria for the selection of [V PP PP].

- Only two PPs in postverbal position were allowed.
- V must be simple and not a phrasal verb.
- V could be finite or non-finite, as well as transitive or intransitive.
- PP must dominate [P NP]
- No PPs consisting of further PPs

As can be seen, a few criteria were omitted, with the intention to preserve learner data that might be ignored otherwise, due to errors of various kinds that might have occurred but not disturbed the intelligibility of a given sentence. In example 15 below, exemplary sentences are listed that were excluded from the analysis.

- (15) a. How about looking at it on Saturday ? (GER-at/on-43)
 b. How about at lunch time on Friday ? (GER-at/on-91)
 c. Hello I work in a small hospital at a nurse . (GER-in/at-07)
 d. We lived in a big house with a big garden – all that seems like a dream !
 (GER-in/with-145)
 e. It was so funny with there , in the park (GER-with/in-746)
 f. In the moorning at 11 o' clock on the sanday he goes to the park and plays tennis at 11:30 . (RUS-at/on-9)
 g. I have breakfast at 10:30 . in the morning . (RUS-at/in-730)
 h. I feed the dog everyday again at 5pm . And in th afternoon I walk the dog .
 (FRA-at/in-236)

Indicated in round brackets behind these sentences, which can be found in the appendix, is the learner nationality, the PP combination and the respective serial number. Sentences a. and b. were omitted, because the first contains a phrasal verb and the latter does not contain a verb at all. In sentence c, the learner presumably meant to write as, which means that the choice of preposition and therefore the order of the two PPs was unintentional. Sentence d. was omitted, because – M-P-T ordering and syntactic weight aside – the order is not arbitrary, since with a big garden further describes the house. Sentence e. was omitted, because it cannot be reliably determined what the learner meant to express with there, which rendered the assignation of a semantic class impossible. Sentence f. was excluded, because it contains more than two PPs that are partly in preverbal position, and finally, sentence g. was excluded, because the period could imply that the learner initially meant to start a new sentence or that in the morning is actually part of the following sentence. Sentences were left out whenever the classification of the elicited sentences turned out to be more complicated or whenever there was any indication in the text that the learner may have produced a certain sentence the way it is by accident, such as c. and g. above.

Once the amount of data was set, further means of analysis were established such as the determination of the semantic class of the PPs under investigation. In order to obtain semantic categories, Hawkins (2000: 238) was consulted once more, so that a comparison to his data would be possible. The semantic categories Manner,

Place and Time, which were assigned to the various PPs, were defined with the help of Hawkins' (2000: 238) criteria, which can be found below in table 6.

Table 6. The major semantic categories assigned to PPs (Hawkins 2000: 238).

Manner-Place-Time categories
M	Manner (how?)
Me	Means (by what means?)
I	Instrument (with what instrument?)
L	Locative (where?)
D	Direction (where to?)
S	Source (where from?)
T	Time (when? how often? etc.)

The categories Manner, Means and Instrument were summarized to Manner; Locative, Direction and Source were summarized to Place and finally Time was understood in this study as it is understood in Hawkins (ibid.).

Once these boundary conditions were set, the authentic learner data was further inspected for weight effects. German and French sentences were analyzed first, due to the high amount of Russian data, which will be addressed in 5.3 again, and the uncertainty of how to proceed with this data set. When the original PP combinations containing at, on and in were analyzed, it was noted that only a small number of PPs could be assigned to the semantic class Manner. The number of sequences containing at least one occurrence of Manner all in all came to 98 in the German group and 83 in the French group. It was then decided to add with to the analysis, which also had the advantage of allowing me to use it as a benchmark for analyzing weight effects. Wasow (1997: 348) uses the term weight effects to refer to the tendency of constituents to occur in order of increasing size or complexity. In this thesis, however, the term weight effects will be used in a broader sense to characterize the effect syntactic weight has on learners in general. In some sentences it was rather difficult to assign just one semantic class to the two PPs, since more than one option would have been acceptable.

- (16) a. It would be great if you 'll make music with Patrick at the birthday party .
(GER-with/at-38)
- b. I m terribly sorry that I missed your wedding , but I had an accident with my car on the way . (GER-with/on-242)
- c. [Outside the airport , the temperature was scorching so] we were covered with sweat in a minute . (FRA-with/in-28)
- d. It was also very interesting to speak with you at the interview .
(RUS-with/at-16)
- e. I 'm working in informatic domain with microsoft technologie .
(FRA-in/with-444)

In a. at the party might be both, Time and Place, which applies to on the way in b. and to at the interview in d. as well. However, since all three sentences contain a Manner-PP it does not affect the analysis, because both Time and Place are supposed to follow Manner when applying the M-P-T rule. In a. and d. it was then ruled that the PP shall be classified as Place, while b. was classified as Time. In c. in a minute gives a timeframe of the described event, while at the same time it could be replaced with ‘in an instant’, which describes the manner of how fast the speaker was covered in sweat, which is why it was classified as such. Sentence e. illustrates that ideational places such as the informatic domain, i.e. ‘informatics’ were counted as proper places.

Since the object of this study were learners of English at various levels, various types of errors were expected to occur. As long as these errors did not affect the intelligibility of the material or in any way the general handling of the data, they were widely ignored and the respective sentences were analyzed anyway. The sentences in (17) below contain errors, but nonetheless were analyzed for weight effects.

- (17) a. Ussualy I sit on the desk at my computer . (RUS-on/at-28)
- b. Then i saw the man which ran in the street with gun and bag .
(Rus-in/with-26)
- c. I maked the beds on Monday and Wednesday in the morning
(Fra-on/in-73)
- d. I usually get up at 8 oâ€™clock in the morning . (RUS-at/in-82)

In sentence a, usually is misspelled, in b. which was chosen instead of who and in c. the learner formed the past tense of to make incorrectly. In d, it is obvious that the word containing the bug is meant to be o'clock, which is why this sentence was considered in the analysis. Note however that in a different case, a bug like this may have caused the sentence to be excluded from the analysis, if it rendered the sentence or at least parts of it unintelligible.

The weight of the respective PPs was determined by counting words, as is suggested in Wasow (1997: 348), who remarks that grammatical weight may be characterized in number of words, number of nodes, and number of phrasal nodes and concludes that “these measures are indistinguishable as predictors of constituent order.” Furthermore, one of the semantic classes Manner (M), Place (P) and Time (T) was assigned, the learner’s proficiency level was noted and the weight difference in numbers was determined. It was also noted whether a long PP preceded a short one (L-S), a short PP preceded a long one (S-L) and if the PPs were of equal length (E). In (a) – (d) for four authentic examples can be found that went into the analysis.

- (a) Then I set the table at 6 pm with Granny . (RUS-at/with-19)
 (b) I read my emails at 4 o clock in the afternoon . (GER-at/in-14)
 (c) The party start at seventy-nine in the evening . (FRA-at/in-500)
 (d) I 'm driving there on friday night with Laura [, and we will arrive on 10 pm .]
 (FRA-on/with-66)

Sentence ID	Semantic classification	Syntactic weight	Relation	Weight differences	Proficiency level	CEFR level
a	T-M	3-2	L-S	1	4	A2
b	T-T	3-3	E	0	3	A1
c	T-T	3-3	E	0	2	A1
d	T-M	3-2	L-S	1	5	A2

In b. the word o'clock appears with an additional space between 'o' and 'clock', nonetheless, this was counted as one word, since all occurrences of o'clock were spelled as such and it is assumed that this happened due to electronic data processing. Words that were joined by a hyphen, such as 'seventy-nine' in c were counted separately. In d brackets were included to indicate the part of a sentence that was ignored in the analysis, which can be found in the appendix. This was done in order to facilitate the reader's comprehension of the part that was analyzed in a longer sentence or because the sentence contained further prepositions. Parts of sentences were disregarded only when the sentence structure would allow this, as is the case in d above, where the sentence consists of two clauses that may occur independently as well.

To ensure the comparability of the frequencies in the learners' data sets, as well as the validity of their description and interpretation, the chi square ( $\chi^2$ )-score of certain data sets was calculated. With the help of statistical tests of significance, such as chi square it can be determined, whether differences in data sets occur by chance or are statistically significant. This is done by comparing the observed frequencies of a data set to the expected frequencies.

More precisely, tests of significance help to determine if and to what degree the null hypothesis can be rejected, which states that there are no significant differences in the distribution of the data. If the null hypothesis can be disproven with a sufficient degree of certainty, the data distribution is not accidental. Mukherjee (2009: 88) points out that only a significance level of at least 5% allows reliable conclusions, which means that the null hypothesis must be disproven by 95% in order to render the data statistically significant. In order to determine the level of significance of the data distribution, the  $\chi^2$ -value is aligned with a reference table of threshold values. This is done by determining the degrees of freedom (df), which result from the numbers of rows and columns, and then matching the  $\chi^2$ -value with the nearest value in the table. The degree of freedom is determined with the equation (number of rows -1) x ( number of collumns -1). The reference table that was used in this study can be found in (7) below.

For example, a  $\chi^2$ -score of 18.80, as was the case in table 30 in section 5.4, needs to be matched with the scores in the fourth row, because it consist of three rows and three brackets. Due to the  $\chi^2$ -score of 18.80 of the data in table 30 in section 5.4, it is safe to assume that the data are statistically significant, due to the significance level of 0.001, which means that the null hypothesis can be rejected by 99.9%.

5 Results and discussion

In this section, the data that was elicited in all three learner groups is shown and compared to each other, as well as to Hawkins' data. In section 5.1, the data that stem from the German learner group are shown; section 5.2 is dedicated to the French learners and section 5.3 to the Russian learners. Finally in 5.4, the results from these three learner groups are discussed and compared to data that stem from Hawkins (2000). Furthermore, the test of statistical significance chi square was carried out, in order to corroborate the validity of the statements and conclusions which were drawn in 5.4.

5.1 The German learners

From the total of 551,036 scripts in EFCAMDAT 28,555 are by the German group, which means that 2,188,806, i.e. 6.6% of all 32,980,407 words in EFCAMDAT were produced by this learner group. In the German learner group, the search for all PP combinations yielded a total of 5,173 sentences that were examined and ultimately, 1,929 out of those 5,173 hits were analyzed for weight effects. Table 8 below offers a breakdown of how all PP combinations are distributed among the 1,929 sentences.

Table 8. Overall number of hits compared to the number of sentences that were analyzed in the German group.

PP combination	Overall hits	Analyzed sentences

with-in	673	187
Total	5,173	1,929

As can be seen, the original amount of data was reduced by 62.7% due to the various factors that were described in section 4.2 above.

For a first overview of the effects that syntactic weight had on the German learners, all 1,929 sentences were analyzed accordingly. Table 9 below shows the distribution of all hits among the combination possibilities long-short, short-long and the number of PP sequences of equal length.

Table 9. Weight effects on all analyzed sentences in the German group

	Long-short	Short-long	Equal length	Total
All PP combinations	18.5% (356)	33.0% (637)	48.5% (936)	1,929

As can be seen, the PP sequences are of equal length in the majority of sentences, followed by shorter PPs preceding longer ones, which amount to 33.0% of the German data set and longer PPs preceding shorter ones in 18.5% of the sentences. So far, a preference for short-long PP sequences can be detected only in comparison to long-short sequences, since almost half (48.5%) of the PP sequences in this group contain PPs that are of the same length.

In order to gain further insight into how the German learners were influenced by the syntactic weight of the PPs, table 10 below shows the distribution of all PP pairings among the combination options M-M, P-P and T-T, since those are not affected by the M-P-T rule. PP sequences of this type make up 60.2% (1,161/1,929) of the data set.

Table 10. Weight effects on PP combinations, which are unaffected by M-P-T in the German group.

	Long-short	Short-long	Equal	Row total
M-M	15.3% (20)	44.3% (58)	40.4% (53)	131
P-P	35.8% (62)	33.5% (58)	30.7% (53)	173
T-T	11.4% (98)	26.2% (225)	62.4% (536)	857

If all three PP sequences are considered in their entirety, longer PPs precede shorter ones in 15.4% of all sentences and shorter PPs precede longer ones in 29.3%, which means that in 55.3% of all sentences the PP sequences are of the same length. Again, the majority of sentences contains PP sequences of equal length, followed by short-long sequences, which exceed long-short sequences by only 13.9 percentage points. In section 5.4, these values will be discussed again and furthermore, they will be contrasted with the results of the French and the Russian group.

Furthermore, M-P-T is taken into account and the three PP combinations M-P, M-T and P-T, which are in accordance with the rule, are analyzed for weight effects. Table 11 below shows a total of 452 sentences that fall into this category, which makes up 23.3% of all the sentences in the German group.

Table 11. Weight effects on PP combinations, which are in accordance with M-P-T in the German group.

	Long-short	Short-long	Equal	Row total
M-P	29.7% (68)	31.9% (73)	38.4% (88)	229
M-T	21.7% (20)	22.8% (21)	55.4% (51)	92
P-T	30.5% (40)	29.8% (39)	38.9% (51)	131

In 28.4% of all sentences that follow M-P-T the longer PPs preceded the shorter ones, in 29.5% the shorter PPs preceded the longer ones and in 42.1% the PPs were of equal length. Interestingly, the number of short-long sequences and that of long-short sequences is almost equally high, so that a clear preference for either ordering cannot be observed. Again, the preference for PP sequences of equal length overrides the other two orderings, however not to the same degree as was the case in table 10 above. In section 5.4, these values will be discussed again and furthermore, they will be contrasted with the results of the other two learner groups.

Finally, all PP combinations that deviate from the M-P-T rule are considered in table 12 below. The combinations T-M, P-M and T-P amount to 318, i.e. the remaining 16.5% of the German data set.

Table 12. Weight effects on PP combinations which deviate from M-P-T in the German group.

	Long-short	Short-long	Equal	Row total
T-M	6.7% (2)	36.7% (11)	56.7% (17)	30
P-M	13.0% (23)	58.2% (103)	28.8% (51)	177
T-P	21.6% (24)	46.0% (51)	32.4% (36)	109

In this set of data the preference for shorter PPs to longer ones is more pronounced than was the case in tables 10 and 11, since more than half (51.9%) of the PP sequences are ordered in this manner. Only 15.4% of the PP sequences are ordered long before short and 32.7% of the PP combinations are of equal length. In section 5.4, these values will be discussed again and furthermore, they will be contrasted with the results of the French and the Russian group. Comparing tables 11 and 12 it may be concluded that learners deviated from M-P-T, because they preferred the ordering of shorter constituents before longer ones to an ordering that is the other way around.

In order to take a more differentiated look at the learner data, the factor of L2 language proficiency is taken into account as well. Table 13 offers an overview of how all analyzed PP sequences are distributed across the 16 proficiency levels in EFCAMDAT. It is further shown how the EFCAMDAT levels are translated into the CEFR proficiency levels as means of summary of the data.

Table 13. Distribution of all PP sequences across the proficiency levels of EFCAMDAT and of the CEFR in the German group.

Total	1,929		1,929

As can be seen, the beginners' levels A1 and A2 are overrepresented since the data retrieved from this group makes up 81.5% (1,572/1,929) of the whole data set. The intermediate levels B1 and B2 make up 16.6% (320/1,929) and the advanced levels C1 and C2 make up only 1.9% (37/1,929) of the German data set. Since the last group is underrepresented to such an extent, the data will be shown together with the data from levels A1—B2, but they will be interpreted with caution. In the following, all data will be presented along the lines of the CEFR, since this makes a more compact overview of the data possible. Figure 4 shows the three combination possibilities M-M, P-P and T-T that are unaffected by M-P-T and it further shows the extent to which learners at different proficiency levels were affected by syntactic weight.

Figure 4. The distribution of M-M, P-P and T-T sequences across all six CEFR proficiency levels in the German group.<sup>3</sup>

This figure shows that the further the learners' proficiency progresses, the more they prefer long-short sequences with a steady rise from 7.2% at level A1 to 30.0% at level B2. At the same time, learners seem to avoid PP sequences of equal length, since they decrease from 75.8% at level A1 to 36.7% at level B2. The use of short-long sequences is rather restrained in the proficiency groups A1 and C1 with 16.9% and 18.2% respectively, while it remains static at levels A2-B2 with a share of 33.3% – 35.3%. The further the learners progress in the course, the fewer processing difficulties they seem to have with long-short sequences, because the tendency to order PPs this way rises.

<sup>3</sup> Please note that all the data, which was used to illustrate the learners' performance at all six CEFR proficiency levels can be found in the appendix.

Figure 5. The distribution of M-P, M-T and P-T sequences across all six CEFR proficiency levels in the German group.

As can be seen in figure 5, the learners' tendency to use short-long sequences rises as they become more advanced in their language proficiency, from 22.0% on A1 to 38.7% on B2. This is mirrored in the general decline in the occurrences of long short sequences, which drops from 39.4% at level A1 to 19.4% on B2. The use of PPs of equal length does not seem to be related to this tendency, since the number of those sequences varies through all proficiency levels.

Figure 6 below shows the three combination options P-M, T-M and T-P which deviate from M-P-T and it further shows how learners at different proficiency levels were affected by syntactic weight.

Figure 6. The distribution of P-M, T-M and T-P sequences across all six CEFR proficiency levels in the German group.

Noticeable about figure 6 is the more frequent use of short-long sequences that was already observed in table 12 and, in correlation to that, the rare use of long-short sequences. In comparison to figures 4 and 5, a declining or increasing tendency in any of the three orderings is not detectable, since all three vary through all six proficiency levels without showing a significant trend.

Finally, table 14 below shows the weight differences of all PP sequences of unequal length in the German data set, in order to find an explanation for the inconsistencies that were addressed above. These differences are displayed in word quantities, as was done in Hawkins (2000: 237) as well.

Table 14. Weight differences in word quantities of long-short sequences and short-long sequences in the German group.

	1	2-4	5-6	>7
Long-short	38.5% (288)	28.8% (68)	0.0% (0)	0.0% (0)
Short-long	61.5% (460)	71.2% (168)	100% (6)	100% (3)

n=1929

As was noted in table 9, in almost half (48.3%) of the 1,929 sentences the PP sequences are of equal length, which is not shown in table 14 above. A high number of PP sequences had a weight difference of just one word, which can be seen in the first column, where the total of 748 make up 39.0% of all the sentences in the German group. Sentences that contain PP sequences with a weight difference of 2-4 words make up 12.2% of the whole German data set, which only leaves 0.5% of PP sequences with a weight difference greater than five words. Considering the circumstance that just 12.7% of all sentences contained PP sequences that had a weight difference of more than two words, it is not surprising that in some instances, syntactic weight did not seem to influence the German learners. It is noted, nonetheless, that in all four columns the number of short-long PP sequences exceeds the number of the alternative ordering and it further seems to be the learners' preferred option to order the shorter PP before the longer one, if their weight differs by 5 words or more.

5.2 The French learners

From the total of 551,036 scripts in EFCAMDAT 21,600 are by the French group, which means that 1,464,165, i.e. 4.4% of all 32,980,407 words in EFCAMDAT were produced by this group. In the French learner group, the search for all PP combinations yielded a total of 3,720 sentences that were examined, out of which 1,358 were analyzed for weight effects. Table 15 below offers a breakdown of how all PP combinations are distributed among all 1,358 sentences.

Table 15. Overall number of hits compared to the number of sentences, which were analyzed in the French group.

PP combination	Overall hits	Analyzed sentences
at-on	137	66
on-at	581	241
at-in	667	296
in-at	354	137
at-with	77	29
with-at	108	28
on-in	256	107
in-on	315	57
on-with	139	58
with-on	132	24
in-with	539	197
with-in	415	118
Total	3720	1358

As can be seen, the original amount of data was reduced by 63.4% due to the various factors that were described in section 4.2.

To gain a first overview of the effects that syntactic weight had on the French learners, all 1,358 sentences were analyzed accordingly. Table 16 below shows the distribution of all hits among the combinations long-short and short-long for PP sequences of unequal length, as well as the number of PPs of equal length.

Table 16. Weight effects on all analyzed sentences in the French group

	Long-short	Short-long	Equal length	Total
All PP combinations	17.4% (236)	35.0% (476)	47.5% (646)	1,358

As can be seen, in the majority of sentences the PP sequences were of equal length, followed by shorter PPs preceding longer ones, which made up 35.0% of the French data set and longer PPs preceding shorter ones in 17.4% of the sentences. So far, a preference for short-long sequences can be detected only in comparison to long-short sequences, since almost half (47.5%) of the PP sequences in this group contain PPs that are of equal length.

In order to gain further insight into how the French learners were influenced by the syntactic weight of the PPs, table 17 below shows the distribution of all PP pairings among the combinations M-M, P-P and T-T, since those are not affected by the M-P-T rule. PP sequences of this type make up 55.1% (749/1,358) of the data set.

Table 17. Weight effects on PP combinations that are unaffected by the M-P-T rule in the French group.

	Long-short	Short-long	Equal	Row total
M-M	15.4% (12)	47.4% (37)	37.2% (29)	78
P-P	24.6% (33)	31.3% (42)	44.0% (59)	134
T-T	13.8% (74)	24.7% (133)	61.5% (330)	537

If all three PP sequences are considered en masse, longer PPs preceded shorter ones in 15.8% of all sentences and shorter PPs preceded longer ones in 28.3%, which means that in 55.8% of all sentences the PP sequences are of equal length. Again, the majority of sentences contains PP sequences of equal length, followed by short-long sequences, which exceed long-short sequences by only 12.5 percentage points. In section 5.4, these values will be discussed again and furthermore, they will be compared to the results of the German and the Russian group.

Furthermore, M-P-T is taken into account and the three PP combinations M-P, M-T and P-T, which are in accordance with the rule, are analyzed for weight effects. As can be seen in table 18 below, a total of 296 sentences falls into this category, which makes up 21.9% of the sentences.

Table 18. Weight effects on PP combinations that are in accordance with the M-P-T rule in the French group.

	Long-short	Short-long	Equal	Row total
M-P	22.7% (32)	41.1% (58)	36.2% (51)	141
M-T	22.6% (14)	33.9% (21)	43.5% (27)	62
P-T	34.0% (32)	27.7% (26)	38.3% (36)	93

In 26.3% of all sentences that follow M-P-T the longer PPs precede the shorter ones, in 35.3% the shorter PPs precede the longer ones and in 38.4% the PPs are of equal length. The number of short-long sequences is higher than that of long-short sequences by only 9%, so that a preference for the ordering can be observed, however to a small degree. Again, the preference for PP sequences of equal length predominates the other two orderings, but not to the same extent as in table 17 above. In section 5.4, these values will be discussed again and they will be compared to the results of the other two learner groups.

Finally, all PP combinations that deviate from the M-P-T rule are considered in table 19 below. The combinations T-M, P-M and T-P amount to 313, i.e. the remaining 23.0% of the French data set.

Table 19. Weight effects on PP combinations that deviate from the M-P-T rule in the French group.

	Long-short	Short-long	Equal	Row total
T-M	12.0% (3)	16.0% (4)	72.0% (18)	25
P-M	9.0% (20)	57.4% (128)	33.6% (75)	223
T-P	26.2% (17)	41.5% (27)	32.3% (21)	65

In this set of data the preference for shorter PPs to precede longer ones is more pronounced than was the case in tables 17 and 18, since more than half (50.8%) of the PP sequences were ordered in this manner. Only 12.8% of the PP sequences were ordered long before short and 36.4% of the PP combinations were of equal length. In section 5.4, these values will be discussed again and furthermore, they will be compared to the results of the German and the Russian group. Comparing tables 18 and 19 it may be concluded that learners deviated from M-P-T, because they preferred the ordering of shorter constituents before longer ones to the reverse order.

In order to take a more differentiated look at the learner data, the factor of L2 language proficiency is taken into account as well. Table 20 offers an overview of how all analyzed PP sequences are distributed across the 16 proficiency levels in EFCAMDAT. It is further shown how the EFCAMDAT levels are translated into the CEFR proficiency levels as means of summary of the data.

Table 20. Distribution of all PP sequences across the proficiency levels of EFCAMDAT and of the CEFR in the French group.

As can be seen, the beginners' levels A1 and A2 are overrepresented and the data retrieved from this group make up 84.8% (1,151/1,358) of the whole data set. The intermediate levels B1 and B2 make up 14.1% (192/1,358) and the advanced levels C1 and C2 make up only 1.1% (15/1,358) of the French data set. Since the last group is underrepresented to such an extent, the data will be shown together with the data from levels A1 – B2, but it will be interpreted with caution. In the following, all data will be presented along the lines of the CEFR, since this makes a more compact overview of the data possible. Figure 7 shows the three combination options M-M, P-P and T-T that are unaffected by M-P-T and it further shows how learners were affected by syntactic weight.

Figure 7. The distribution of M-M, P-P and T-T sequences across all six CEFR proficiency levels in the French group.

Interestingly, as the learners' proficiency advances, the preference for long-short sequences rises from 11.6% on A1 to 28.6% on B2. At the same time, short-long sequences are being used more frequently, as they rise from 14.8% at level A1 to 15.0% on B2. The use of sequences of equal length decreases throughout A1-B2 from 73.6% to 21.4% and vanishes at levels C1 and C2. The further the learners progress in the Englishtown course, the fewer processing difficulties they seem to have with long-short sequences, since the tendencies to order PPs this way rises.

Figure 8 shows the three combination options M-P, M-T and P-T which are in accordance with M-P-T and it further shows how learners at different proficiency levels were affected by syntactic weight.

Figure 8. The distribution of M-P, M-T and P-T sequences across all six CEFR proficiency levels in the French group.

As the learners' proficiency progresses, their preference for short-long sequences rises, from 24.2% at level A1 to 64.3% at level B2. The use of PPs of equal length regresses, from 47.4% on A1 to 14.3% on B2, with a small rise of 66.7% at level C1. The use of long-short sequences varies across the proficiency levels, which might indicate that weight effects did not have a wide influence on the ordering of the PPs.

Figure 9. The distribution of P-M, T-M and T-P sequences across all six CEFR proficiency levels in the French group.

As is illustrated in figure 9, the use of long-short sequences rises through levels A1 to B1 from 7.4% to 22.1%, then drops to 12.5% at level B2 and is no longer perceptible at levels C1 and 2. The use of PPs of equal length drops through levels A1 to B2 from 41.5% to 12.5% and is no longer perceptible at levels C1 and 2 as well. The use of short-long sequences varies though all proficiency levels and even amounts to 100% at levels C1 and C2; however, it should be kept in mind that the total number of analyzed sentences at these two levels amounts only to four.

Finally, table 21 below shows the weight differences of all PP sequences in the French data set, in order to find an explanation for the inconsistencies that were addressed above. These differences are displayed in word quantities, as was done in Hawkins (2000: 237) as well.

Table 21. Weight differences in word quantities of long-short sequences and short-long sequences in the French group.

	1	2-4	5-6	>7
Long-short	36.7% (196)	24.2% (40)	0	0
Short-long	63.2% (339)	75.6% (125)	100% (8)	100% (5)

$n=1359$

As was noted in table 16, in almost half (47.5%) of the 1,358 sentences the PP sequences are of equal length, which is not shown in table 21 above. Another high number of PP sequences has a weight difference of just one word, which can be seen in the first column, where the total of 535 makes up 39.4% of all the sentences in the French group. Sentences that contain PP sequences with a weight difference of 2-4 words make up 12.1% of the whole French data set, which only leaves 1.0% of PP sequences with a weight difference greater than five words. Considering the circumstance that just 13.1% of all sentences contain PP sequences that have a weight difference of more than two words, it may not surprise that in some instances, syntactic weight did not seem to influence the French learners. It is noted, nonetheless, that in all four columns the number of short-long PP sequences exceeds the number of the reverse ordering and it further seems that the learners consistently use the shorter PP before the longer one, if their weight differs in 5 words or more.

5.3 The Russian learners

From the total of 551,036 scripts in EFCAMDAT 43,049 are by the Russian group, meaning that 2,936,084, i.e. 8.9% of all 32,980,407 words in EFCAMDAT were produced by this group. In the Russian learner group, the search for all PP combinations yielded a total of 7,636 sentences that were to be inspected. It was then decided to shorten this number by 2500 sentences, which was accomplished by calculating the proportion of each PP combination and by multiplying their percentage with the new sum of 5,136 sentences, which is illustrated table 22 below.

Table 22. Shortened results compared to the number of sentences that were analyzed in the Russian group.

PP combination	Original results		Reduced results		Analyzed sentences

Total	7,636	100.0%	5,124	100,0%	1,874

The search for the combination at-on for instance yielded a total of 289 hits, which make up 3.8% of the total number of 7,636 sentences. The targeted number of 5,136 was then multiplied by 0.038 to arrive at the new number of at-on combinations in the reduced sample. This was done with all PP combinations, until the new number of sentences that were to be analyzed came to 5,124, due to rounding, and ultimately 1,874 sentences were analyzed for weight effects.

To gain a first overview of the effects that syntactic weight had on the Russian learners, all 1,874 sentences were analyzed accordingly. Table 23 below shows the distribution of all hits among the combination possibilities long-short and short-long for PP sequences of unequal length, as well as the number of those of equal length.

Table 23. Weight effects on all analyzed sentences in the Russian group.

	Long-short	Short-long	Equal length	Total
All PP combinations	14.1% (265)	38.6% (723)	47.3% (886)	1,874

As can be seen, in the majority of sentences the PP sequences are of equal length, followed by shorter PPs preceding longer ones, which make up 38.6% of the Russian data set and longer PPs preceding shorter ones in 14.1% of the sentences. So far, a preference for short-long sequences can be detected only in comparison to long-short sequences, since almost half (47.3%) of the PP sequences in this group contain PPs that are of equal length.

In order to gain further insight into how the Russian learners were influenced by the syntactic weight of the PPs the distribution of all PP pairings among the orderings M-M, P-P and T-T were taken into account. These PP sequences, which are not affected by the M-P-T rule, make up 60.8% (1,139/1,875) of the data set as is shown in table 24 below.

Table 24. Weight effects on PP combinations that are unaffected by the M-P-T rule in the Russian group.

-----	-----	---	-----------

M-M	26.3% (20)	31.6% (24)	42.1% (32)	76
P-P	22.1% (30)	37.5% (51)	40.4% (55)	136
T-T	8.1% (75)	34.4% (318)	57.5% (534)	927

If all three PP sequences are considered in their entirety, longer PPs precede shorter ones in 11.0% of all sentences and shorter PPs precede longer ones in 34.6%, which means that in 54.5% of all sentences the PP sequences are of equal length. Again, the majority of sentences contains PP sequences of equal length followed by short-long sequences, which exceed long-short sequences by 23.6 percentage points. In section 5.4, these values will be discussed again and furthermore, they will be compared to the results of the other two learner groups.

Furthermore, M-P-T is taken into account and the three PP combinations M-P, M-T and P-T, which are in accordance with the rule, are analyzed for weight effects. Table 25 below shows that a total of 408 sentences fall into this category, which makes up 21.7% of the sentences.

Table 25. Weight effects on PP combinations that are in accordance with the M-P-T rule in the Russian group.

M-P	18.2% (29)	32.7% (52)	49.1% (78)	159
M-T	17.6% (21)	37.8% (45)	44.5% (53)	119
P-T	39.2% (51)	29.2% (38)	31.5% (41)	130

In 24.8% of all sentences that followed M-P-T the longer PPs preceded the shorter ones, in 33.1% the shorter PPs preceded the longer ones and in 42.1% the PPs were of equal length. The percentage of short-long sequences is higher than that of long-short sequences by only 8.3%, so that a preference for the ordering can be observed, however to a slight extent. Again, the preference for PP sequences of equal length overrides the other two orderings, but not to the same degree as was the case in table 24 above. In section 5.4, these values will be discussed again and furthermore, they will be compared to the results of the German and the French group.

Finally, all PP combinations that deviate from the M-P-T rule are considered in table 26 below. The combinations T-M, P-M and T-P amount to 327, i.e. the remaining 17.4% of the Russian data set.

Table 26. Weight effects on PP combinations that deviate from the M-P-T rule in the Russian group.

	L-S	S-L	E	Row total
T-M	8.3% (1)	25.0% (3)	66.7% (8)	12
P-M	7.7% (19)	64.1% (159)	28.2% (70)	248
T-P	28.4% (19)	49.3% (33)	22.4% (15)	67

In this set of data the preference for shorter PPs to longer ones is more pronounced than was observed in tables 24 and 25, since more than half (59.6%) of the PP sequences are ordered in this manner. Only 12.0% of the PP sequences are ordered long before short and 28.4% of the PP combinations are of equal length. In section 5.4, these values will be discussed again and furthermore, they will be contrasted with the results of the German and the French group. Comparing tables 25 and 26 it may be concluded that learners deviated from M-P-T, because they preferred the ordering of shorter constituents before longer ones to an ordering that is the other way around.

In order to take a more differentiated look at the learner data, the factor of L2 language proficiency is taken into account as well. Table 27 offers an overview of how all analyzed PP sequences are distributed across the 16 proficiency levels in EFCAMDAT. It is further shown how the EFCAMDAT levels are translated into the CEFR proficiency levels as means of summary of the data.

Table 27. Distribution of all PP sequences across the proficiency levels of EFCAMDAT and of the CEFR in the Russian group.

Total	1,874	1,874

As can be seen, the beginners' levels A1 and A2 are overrepresented since the data that was retrieved from this group make up 87.0% (1,630/1,874) of the whole data set. The intermediate levels B1 and B2 make up 12.3% (231/1,874) and the advanced levels C1 and C2 make up only 0.7% (13/1,874) of the Russian data set. Since the last group is underrepresented to such an extent, the data will be shown together with the data from levels A1 – B2, but it will be interpreted with caution. In the following, all data will be presented along the lines of the CEFR, since this makes a more compact overview of the data possible. Figure 10 shows the three combinations M-M, P-P and T-T that are unaffected by M-P-T and it further shows how learners were influenced by syntactic weight.

Figure 10. The distribution of M-M, P-P and T-T sequences across all six CEFR proficiency levels in the Russian group.

As was observed in the German and the French group already, the preference for long-short sequences reflects the learners' proficiency, from 6.4% at level A1 to 38.5% at level B2. The frequency of PPs of equal length drops from 76.5% at A1 to 35.7% at level A2 and then remains between 30.7% and 35.7% at levels B1 and 2. Again, the use of short-long sequences is rather limited in the proficiency groups A1, B1 and B2, with a rise on A2 to 48.8% and even 100% at level C1, but, as was noted above, this level was rather underrepresented and this result should be treated with caution. The further the learners progress in the Englishtown course, the fewer processing difficulties they seem to have with long-short sequences, since the tendency to order PPs this way rises.

Figure 11 shows the three combinations M-P, M-T and P-T which are in accordance with M-P-T and it further shows how learners at different proficiency levels were affected by syntactic weight.

Figure 11. The distribution of M-P, M-T and P-T sequences across all six CEFR proficiency levels in the Russian group.

As can be seen in figure 11, the learners' tendency to construct PPs of equal length decreases through levels A1 – B2 from 48.9% to 14.3% and then rises again at level C1 to 25.0%. The use of short-long sequences increases from 22.2% to 61.9% through levels A1 to B2, while the use of long-short sequences varies through the proficiency levels.

Figure 12. The distribution of P-M, T-M and T-P sequences across all six CEFR proficiency levels in the Russian group.

As figure 12 shows, short-long sequences are the most frequently used order of PPs, as was already observed in table 26, while long-short sequences at first rise from 4.5% at level A1 to 20.8% at A2, but then drop through levels B1 and 2 and no longer occur at levels C1 and 2. PP sequences of equal length were used in almost 30.0% of the sentences through levels A1 – B1, until their use drops to 9.1% at level B2 and then rises again at level C1 to 50.0%, please note, however, that only two sentences were analyzed at levels C1 and 2.

Finally, table 28 below shows the weight differences of all unequal PP sequences in the Russian data set, in order to find an explanation for the inconsistencies that were addressed above. These differences are displayed in word quantities, as was done in Hawkins (2000: 237) as well.

Table 28. Weight differences in word quantities of long-short sequences and short-long sequences in the Russian group.

	1	2-4	5-6	>7
Long-short	29.9% (216)	20.1% (49)	0.0% (0)	0.0% (0)
Short-long	70.1% (528)	79.9% (185)	100% (8)	100% (1)

n=1874

As was noted in table 20, in almost half (47.3%) of the 1,874 sentences the PP sequences were of equal length, which is not shown in table 28 above. Another high number of PP sequences had a weight difference of just one word, which can be seen in the first column, where the total of 744 makes up 39.7% of all the sentences in the Russian group. Sentences that contain PP sequences with a weight difference of 2 – 4 words make up 12.5% of the whole Russian data set, which only leaves 0.5% of PP sequences with a weight difference greater than five words. Considering the circumstance that just 12.7% of all sentences contained PP sequences that had a weight difference of more than two words, it may not surprise that in some instances, syntactic weight did not seem to influence the Russian learners. It is noted, nonetheless, that in all four columns the number of short-long PP sequences exceeds the number of the alternative ordering and learners consistently order the shorter PP before the longer one, if their weight differs in 5 words or more.

5.4 Discussion

The results that were shown in sections 5.1, 5.2 and 5.3 will be discussed here in order to answer the questions that were posed in the introduction. Firstly, the occurrences of M-P-T conforming sequences in comparison to those sequences that deviate from the rule will be discussed. Secondly, native speaker data that was presented in Hawkins (2000) is displayed along the learner data, in order to determine if any of the three learner groups mirrors the statistical make-up of the English language in this respect. Thirdly, the learners' proficiency is taken into account, so that a closer look at the influence of syntactic weight on the learners may be taken. Lastly, the question of whether or not the learners transfer syntactic characteristics from their L1 into their L2 writing is addressed, which might be related to Granger and Gilquin (2015: 423f.) below:

Features that are limited to one L1-group (or several groups with L1s from the same language family) are likely to be due to transfer from the mother tongue (interlingual features). On the other hand, features that are shared by a large number of L1-groups are more probably linked to inherent difficulties in acquiring the target language (developmental features).

A comparison will show the similarities and differences between the German, the French and the Russian data set. Furthermore, a conclusion will be drawn about whether or not the L2 learners of English transfer characteristics from their L1.

For a first overview of the effects that syntactic weight had on the learners, all 5161 sentences were analyzed accordingly in the previous sections. In table 29 below the learner data is presented alongside Hawkins' (2000) native speaker data. It furthermore shows the distribution of the hits among the combinations long-short and short-long for unequal PP sequences, as well as the number of PPs of equal length.

Table 29. Weight effects on all analysed sentences in all learner groups and in comparison to Hawkins (1994, cited in 2000).

	Long-short	Short-long	Equal	Row total
Hawkins	11% (18)	67% (108)	22% (35)	161
German	18.5% (356)	33.0% (637)	48.5% (936)	1,929
French	17.4% (236)	35.0% (476)	47.5% (646)	1,358
Russian	14.1% (265)	38.6% (723)	47.3% (886)	1,874

As can be seen in table 29 above, the distinct preference for short-long PP sequences, which is displayed by Hawkins' native speakers, is not mirrored by any of the three learner groups. The learners for their part constructed PPs of equal length in almost half of the cases in the respective data sets. A preference for short-long sequences over long-short sequences is visible in the German, French and Russian groups as well, however not as clearly as is the case in Hawkins data set. This allows the conclusion that neither of the three learner groups is as driven by weight effects as English native speakers are. Due to a  $\chi^2$ -score of 87.75, if Hawkins data is included and 20.5 if it is not, it is safe to say that, since in both cases a certainty of 99.9% exists, these results do not occur by chance. One of the reasons for this being so might be the fact that German, French and Russian allow syntactically heavier constituents before lighter ones, as was shown in 3.3.1, 3.3.2 and 3.3.3 respectively. Another reason might be the relatively small differences in weight that were produced by the learners, since just about 13.0% of PP sequences had a weight difference of more than two words, which will be shown below in table 34 again.

In order to gain further insight into how the learners were influenced by the syntactic weight of the PPs. Table 30 below shows the distribution of all PP pairings among the combination options M-M, P-P and T-T, since those are not affected by the M-P-T rule. PP sequences of this type make up 59.1% (3,049/5,161) of the complete learner data set.

Table 30. Weight effects on PP combinations that are unaffected by the M-P-T rule in all learner groups.

German	15.5% (180)	29.3% (340)	55.2% (641)	1,161
French	15.8% (119)	28.3% (212)	55.8% (418)	749
Russian	11.0% (125)	34.6% (393)	54.5% (621)	1,139

$$\chi^2 = 18.80$$

The comparison of the PP sequences, to which the rule cannot be applied, shows that all three learner groups prefer PPs of equal length over the other two ordering possibilities, which is conveyed in the remarkably similar and rather high frequencies of this ordering. The ordering of short PPs before longer ones is the second most common ordering in all three learner groups, though the Russian learners show a stronger preference for this than the German and the French learners, which is mirrored in the observed frequencies of long-short sequences. These results lead to the conclusion that if the M-P-T rule is no consideration, the ordering of PP sequences seems to be motivated by the syntactic weight of the respective PPs. It should be noted, however that, since the preference for PPs of equal length is as strong as it is in table 30, this tendency is rather tentative. The chi square test for the data set presented in table 30 above, amounts to a score of 18.80, which means that the null hypothesis can be disproven with a certainty of 99.9%, which means that these results do not occur by chance.

Furthermore, M-P-T is taken into account and the three PP combinations M-P, M-T and P-T, which are in accordance with the rule are analyzed for weight effects. Table 31 below shows that a total of 1,155 sentences fall into this category in the learner group, which makes up 18.8% of all the sentences.

Table 31. Weight effects on PP combinations that are in accordance with the M-P-T rule in all three learner groups.

	Long-short	Short-long	Equal	Row total
German	28.4% (128)	29.5% (133)	42.1% (190)	451
French	26.3% (77)	35.3% (105)	38.4% (114)	296
Russian	24.8% (101)	33.1% (135)	42.1% (172)	408

$$\chi^2 = 3.91$$

As was already noticeable in table 30 above, in all three learner groups PPs of equal length were the most commonly used, followed by short-long sequences and lastly long-short sequences. A clear tendency that is common to all three learner groups cannot be made out, since the use of long-short PP sequences and that of short-long sequences is almost equally high in the German group, while the use of short long sequences is almost as high as the use of PPs of equal length in the French group. In the Russian group, a preference for PPs of equal length over short-long sequences is obvious, which in turn occur more often than long-short sequences; however these preferences appear to be rather tentative. It might be concluded from these results that M-P-T has a stronger influence on the learners and their ordering preferences than syntactic weight. However, the chi square test amounts to a score of 3.91, which means that the null hypothesis can be disproven with a certainty of less than 80.0%, which suggests that these results occur by chance.

Finally, all PP combinations that deviate from the M-P-T rule are considered in table 32 below. The combinations T-M, P-M and T-P make up 956, i.e. the remaining 18.5% of the whole learner data set.

Table 32. Weight effects on PP combinations that deviate from the M-P-T rule in all groups.

	Long-short	Short-long	Equal	Row total
German	15.4% (47)	51.9% (165)	32.7% (104)	316
French	12.8% (40)	50.8% (159)	36.4% (114)	313
Russian	12.0% (39)	59.6% (195)	28.4% (93)	327

$$\chi^2 = 6.94$$

The comparison of the PP sequences which deviate from M-P-T in table 32 shows that all three learner groups clearly prefer short-long sequences over the other two ordering possibilities, which is reflected by the rather high frequencies of this ordering. The ordering of PPs of equal length is the second most common ordering in all three learner groups, although the Russian learners show a stronger preference than the German and the French learners. Finally, long-short sequences are the least often used by all three learner groups, although German learners show a stronger preference for this ordering than the French and the Russian learners. These results might lead to the conclusion that the ordering of PP sequences in the German, the French and the Russian learners' texts deviates from M-P-T, because the syntactic weight of these PP sequences affects the learners choice. However, the chi square test amounts to a score of 6.94, which means that the null hypothesis can be disproven with a certainty of 80.0%, which suggests that these results occur by chance.

In order to take a more differentiated look on the learner data, the factor of L2 language proficiency is further taken into account as well. Figure 13 below offers an overview of how long-short, short-long as well as PP sequences of equal length are distributed across all six CEFR proficiency levels in the three learner groups.

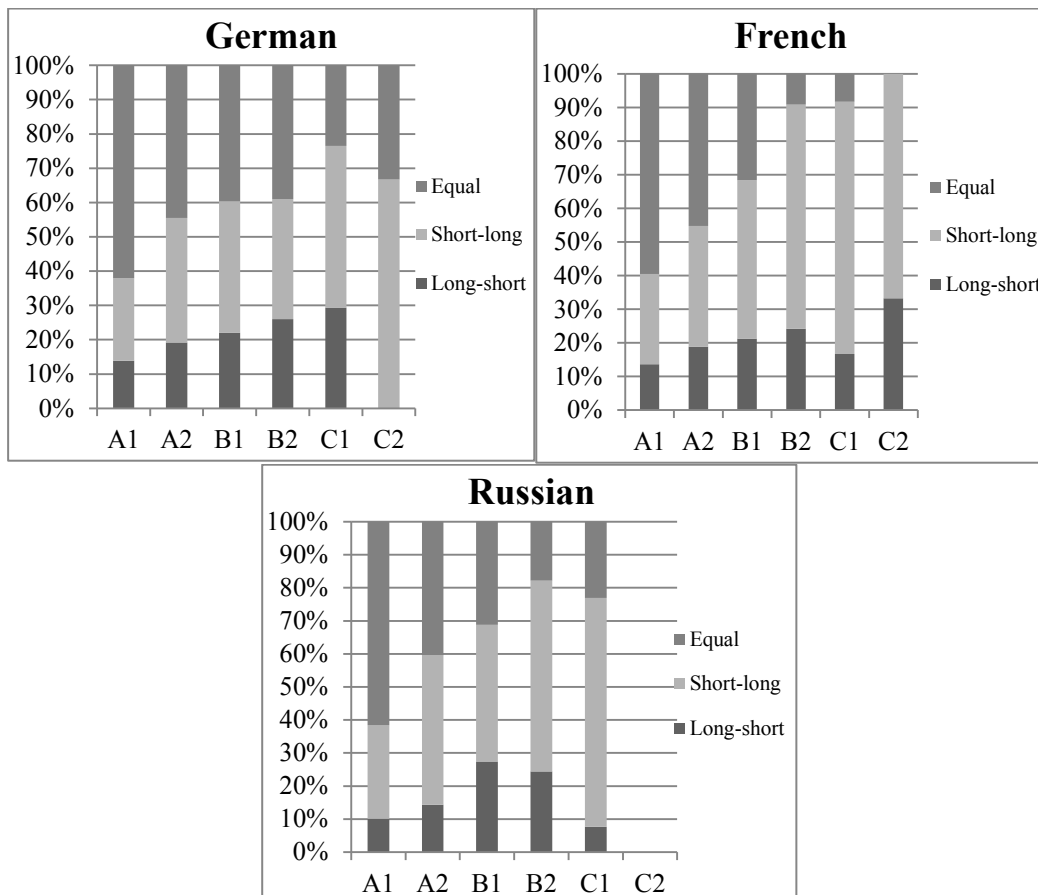

Figure 13. The distribution of all three PP ordering possibilities across all six CEFR-levels in all three learner groups.

As was mentioned above, the data that was analyzed in all three learner groups contain only a small amount of data that stems from the two most proficient levels C1 and C2. Again it is noted here that the data that was retrieved from these levels is displayed along with all other levels, in order to convey every piece of information that was yielded from the corpus analysis. However, due to the fact that reliable statements based on such a small amount of data cannot be made, levels C1 and C2 are excluded from the discussion. All three learner groups have in common that the preference for PP combinations of equal length declines through levels A1 – B2, though in the German group the graph stagnates at levels B1 and B2 on about 39.0%. Remarkably, considering long-short sequences, Germans, French and Russians show a rising tendency through proficiency levels A1 to B2; only in the Russian data set, there is a slight decline at level B2. What attracts attention is that only the use of short-long sequences varies among the three learner groups the way it does.

In the previous sections the learners' ordering of PPs of unequal length was displayed, which is why Hawkins' (2000) data shall be presented briefly in table 33.

Table 33. Weight differences in word quantities of long-short sequences and short-long sequences in Hawkins (2000).

	1	2-4	5-6	>7	Total
Long-short	40% (38)	14% (17)	6% (2)	1% (1)	58
Short-long	60% (58)	86% (108)	94% (31)	99% (68)	265

As can be seen, the learners mirrored the native speakers' tendency to produce fewer PP sequences with higher word quantities and furthermore, the preference for short-long sequences over long-short sequences is visible as well. Table 34 below provides a concise overview of weight differences between PPs of unequal length.

Table 34. Weight differences between the PPs that were analyzed in this study and in Hawkins (2000).

	1	2-4	5-6	>7	Total
Hawkins	24.4% (96)	31.7% (125)	8.4% (33)	17.5% (69)	394
German	39.0% (751)	12.2% (236)	0.3% (6)	0.2% (3)	1930
French	39.4% (536)	12.1% (165)	0.6% (8)	0.4% (5)	1359
Russian	39.7% (744)	12.5% (234)	0.4% (8)	0.1% (1)	1874

As was noted in the above subsections, in almost half of the sentences in all three learner groups, the PP sequences were of equal length, which is not shown in table 34 above. Another high number of PP sequences had a weight difference of just one word, which can be seen in the first column, where the three learner groups show remarkably similar preferences. The same can be observed in the second column, which lists those sentences that contained PP sequences with a weight difference of 2 – 4 words, which only make up just above 12.0% in all three learner groups. Interestingly, Hawkins native speakers show a rise in the number of sentences across these two columns, while the learner groups show a clear reluctance to produce PP sequences with weight differences that are higher than 1. Finally, neither of the three learner groups' data sets show an number of PP sequences, which differed in weight by more than five words, that is higher than 1.0%. Considering the circumstance that just about 13.0% of all sentences in all three learner groups contained PP sequences that had a weight difference of more than two words, it may not surprise that in some instances syntactic weight did not seem to influence the learners to a degree that was as high as that observed by Hawkins.

6 Conclusion

In this section, the insights that were gained in the preceding sections shall be shortly revisited, which is followed by an outlook on further research. Durrant and Siyanova-Chanturia (2015: 63) observe that “[...] studies, which base psycholinguistic conclusions on corpus data alone tend to be vulnerable to the criticism that their evidence underdetermines their conclusions. The language productions represented in corpora are the result of a wide range of both psycholinguistic and situational factors which cannot be easily disentangled. So, while corpus data can suggest potentially fruitful hypotheses about psycholinguistic mechanisms, inferences must be seen as, at best, tentative hypotheses in need of further confirmation through other methods.”

In order to avoid the trap that is described above, the following conclusions will be drawn with caution and not solely based on the data that was received from EFCAMDAT.

The first objective in this limited study was to gain a detailed insight in the ordering of PP sequences according to M-P-T and whether or not this is the predominantly used ordering among the learners. Interestingly, a remarkably small number of produced sentences are in accordance with the rule. In the German data set only 23.3% of all sentences contain a PP ordering of this kind, in the French data set, these orderings amount to 21.9% and in the Russian group to 21.7%. In conclusion it can be said that in this study, M-P-T is not the learners' preferred ordering of PPs, which is in line with Hawkins' (2000) findings. Secondly, the learner data was matched with Hawkins' (ibid.) native speaker data in order to determine, whether the learners mirrored the statistical make-up of English and produce results similar to those of Hawkins (ibid.). This question cannot be answered satisfactorily, since the learners all in all did produce more short-long sequences than long-short sequences, but a high number of PP sequences of the same length renders these preferences only tentative. It is presumed that, since neither of the learner groups produced weight differences of 2 or more words that surpass the amount of 13.0% in the data sets, Hawkins (ibid.) conclusion that “EIC's preferences are weak when word differentials are small, and that some slightly suboptimal orders can be expected in normal production” is confirmed for this limited study.

Unfortunately, proficient L2 learners of English are underrepresented in all three groups, which is why reliable statements cannot be made about learners at the CEFR levels C1 and C2. For future research endeavors it is therefore suggested here that next to a beginners' and an intermediate group, also a proficient learner group is represented to enable a more differentiated insight into the effects that syntactic weight has on L2 learners of English. This proposal is supported by Jarvis and Pavlenko (2008: 98), who enumerate studies which revolve around L2 learners of various languages and which reveal that learners at a higher proficiency level are less dependent on their L1.

Fourthly, considering the learners' first languages and the issue of transfer, it is concluded that the results that were obtained in this study might stem from the influence of the three L1. German, French and Russian display more liberal syntactic orderings than English does, which allow their users an ordering according to topicalization and syntactic weight. In addition to that it was shown in 3.3.1 and 3.3.3 that German and Russian syntax furthermore allows heavier constituents to occur before lighter ones. These factors might explain the fact that the statistical results for English were not mirrored to a stronger degree by any of the three learner groups.

Future endeavors that are devoted to the ordering of PPs in learner English, or any type of constituent for that matter, might focus on the following issues. Firstly, it was not possible within the scope of this small-scale study to focus on topicalization; one of the reasons being that this would have been too expansive. Secondly, data from proficient learners of English should be collected under similar circumstances in order to complete the data set that was gathered here. This way, a statement could be made considering Ellis' (2012: 195) claim that "[l]earning, memory and perception are all affected by frequency of usage: the more times we experience something, the stronger our memory of it, and the more fluently it is accessed." Finally, the problem occurred that the weight differences of the PPs of unequal length were rather small to make a statement that goes beyond a tentative preference for short-long orderings. However, since a greater gap in the search string would have resulted in a high number of PP sequences that go beyond sentence boundaries this was not possible in EFCAMDAT.

Appendix B

All the sentences, that were included in the analysis can be found in the following list, which is first divided into learner group, then PP combination and the serial number. Furthermore, those sentences that were excluded from the analysis, but that were cited as an example above, may be found here as well. The following data consist of written learner English that was retrieved from the EF Cambridge Open Language Database and not one of the sentences was altered in any way. All errors that may be found in these sentences stem from the learners alone and were not corrected, in order to ensure the authenticity of the data. Whenever a sentence was too long or entailed more than two PPs, brackets were included to indicate the part that was ignored in the analysis.
